NEW MARCELLUS SHALE PROTESTS

Workers in Clarksburg and the Upper Ohio Valley area have held protests recently about out-of-state workers taking construction jobs relating to the Marcellus Shale gas fields.

In both cases the message was clear – local construction workers are ready, willing and able to do Marcellus Shale construction projects, but imported workers are getting the jobs.

Operating Engineers and Laborers led a protest in Clarksburg on May 5 and were joined by a number of trades in support.

The protest was in front of Dominion Transmissions Clarksburg offices and focused on the use of Holloman Construction from Texas on a pipeline project in Wetzel County.

“We have plenty of top quality pipeline hands in the Wetzel County area who would love to work close to home,” said Larry Young of Operating Engineers Local

ANNUAL WORKERS MEMORIAL DAY EVENT HELD IN HUNTINGTON

Union members from throughout the state traveled to Huntington on Thursday evening, April 28 to remember fallen workers in observance of national Workers Memorial Day.

The event honored 50 West Virginia workers killed in 2010, including 29 men who died in the explosion at the Upper Big Branch Mine in April 2010 and three men killed in a blast at the AL Solutions chemical plant in New Cumberland.

Workers Memorial Day is an annual event aimed at promoting workplace safety and remembering those workers who have died on the job during the prior year.

The report revealed that West Virginia has experienced 134 deaths from mining accidents in the past decade, giving the state the most deaths in that industry in the time frame.

The West Virginia AFL-CIO observed the day by gathering at the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 317 headquarters along Madison Avenue. The national AFL-CIO issued its annual report, “Death on the Job: The Toll of Neglect,” to coincide with Workers Memorial Day. The report revealed that West Virginia has experienced 134 deaths from mining accidents in the past decade, giving the Democrat Earl Ray Tomblin will go up against Republican Bill Maloney for the Special General Election for Governor to be held in October.

Tomblin was able to beat the WV AFL-CIO endorsed candidate Rick Thompson (D-Wayne) as well as four other democratic candidates. Thompson, who came in second, was endorsed after a series of interviews and a review of questionnaires and candidate track records. He has a 100% voting record on Labor issues.

The Special Election did not get much of a response from the public with an estimated 16 percent of registered voters going to the polls. Organized Labor focused on membership education and voter turnout. “We knew the turnout would be low so we tried to encourage union members to vote,” said Dave Efaw, Secretary-Treasurer of the WV State Building Trades.

The special election was called after former Governor Joe Manchin won his bid to replace Senator Robert C. Byrd. A variety of groups including the WV AFL-CIO challenged the position of Acting Governor Earl Ray Tomblin who said he planned to fill out the two years left in Manchin’s term. The WV Supreme Court overruled Tomblin and ordered a special election.

The court said the election had to be concluded by November of this year. Because the race is a Special Election candidates were able to run without giving up their current elected office. This may have been the reason both parties saw a crowded field of candidates. Whoever wins in October will only be in office for a year. An election for the regular four year term will be held next year.

Also on the ballot were school bond votes in Harrison and Upshur Counties. In Harrison County a $71 million bond failed by 3 to 1. The State School Building Authority (SBA) had committed to give the County $25 million, but only if the bond passed. The funding would have been used for renovations, additions, and new facilities for 11 schools.

In Upshur County a $35 million bond failed which means the County will not be eligible for an additional $13 million from the SBA. The money would have funded the construction of a new Buckhannon-Upshur Middle School as well as improvements in eight other schools in the county.

“Why bring in companies from Texas who import workers?”

“WE SEE PLENTY OF OUT-OF-STATE TRUCKS AND CONSTRUCTION WORKERS WHEN WE NEED THE JOBS FOR LOCAL WORKERS,” WALTER ‘FUZZ’ LA RUE, ACT REPRESENTATIVE

Holloman is building a 24 inch pipeline for Dominion at their Hastings facility in Wetzel County.

Workers from Texas, Oklahoma and Florida have been observed working at the project.

“We want to let the public know we have skilled, qualified people who want and need these jobs,” said Jim Flannigan, Organizer for Iron Workers 549 Wheeling.

According to ACT’s Walter ‘Fuzz’ LaRue the protests have been organized by Flannigan along with Randy Miller of the Electricians with a number of crafts joining.

“We see plenty of out-of-state trucks and construction workers when we need the jobs for local workers,” said LaRue. “Marcellus Shale work should benefit our communities. And local jobs should be everyone’s top priority.”

The response from the public has been overwhelming support. “We see plenty of out-of-state workers going to the polls.” In Ohio, Marshall and Wetzel Counties workers have manned four protests in the last five weeks to draw attention to the same issue “Local Jobs for Local Workers.”

“We see plenty of out-of-state workers when we need the jobs for local workers,” said LaRue. “Marcellus Shale work should benefit our communities. And local jobs should be everyone’s top priority.”
A ceremonial groundbreaking was held on May 9 in Mingo County for an estimated $3-4 billion coal-to-gasoline project.

Developers TransGas LLC from New York say the project, called Adams Fork Energy, will convert 7,500 tons of coal into 756,000 gallons of gasoline per day when in peak production.

The conversion is a two-step process, first turning the coal to a gas, then from gas to gasoline.

The technology has been around for years but this would be the first major North American use.

Exxon together with German company Udhe are the key technology providers.

As the project moves closer to a reality it still faces some major hurdles.

Key to the effort is completing design specifications and a fixed price contract for construction so that financing can be secured.

Just as important the project must be underway by the end of June or face a new environmental regulation on carbon dioxide.

The CO2 rules only go into effect on projects that have not started by July 1.

If the project is not underway it must comply with the new regulation.

That will mean new permits must be applied for and then face any challenges, a process that can take years.

The Tri-State Building Trades is working to finalize a project labor agreement for the undertaking.

“The company has some pretty tight deadlines to reach,” said Steve Burton, Business Manager of the Tri-State Building Trades. “We are very enthusiastic about this project, but recognize it is not yet a done deal.

“We hope they can meet their deadlines not only for the work opportunities but because it is a step towards energy independence for our nation.”

News reports said as many as 3,000 construction workers would be needed but actual manpower numbers have not been published.

Full-time workers are estimated at 300. Production is scheduled to start in 2015.

The remainder goes to police, fire and other county functions.

While the Berkeley County Commission is forgiving taxes the County School Board received around $10 million in assistance from the state School Building Authority earlier this year.

In addition, at the April 21 meeting, it was discovered recent legislation exempted much of the equipment for the distribution center from sales taxes.

Administration officials claimed the legislation had nothing to do with the Macy’s project during the legislative session.

Now, they say the Legislature changed the bill at the last minute unknown to them.

Much of the tax breaks and other funds do require the company to hire 600 workers for their permanent jobs.

But the levels set in documents reflect a requirement for only half the 1200 jobs the company and development officials have touted at press events.
